Senator Dan Sullivan is looking for exceptional students and recent graduates to join his team in Washington, D.C. Many of today’s best and brightest political minds began their careers in public service as interns in public relations, news organizations, and on congressional staffs, both in Alaska and the nation's capital.

Internships teach valuable skills and offer hands on experience in the high paced Capitol Hill environment. Washington, D.C. internships distinguish students and allow them to rise above the pack, particularly with competitive graduate programs. Students interested in politics, public service, public relations, writing and the like can gain valuable experience through an internship in the DC office.

An internship is an entry-level position best suited for a person who thinks creatively, wants to contribute to a team and, above all, yearns for opportunities to learn – whether about the legislative process, research, writing or public communications.

Key skills for interns include:
- the ability to multitask and meet deadlines;
- strong writing skills;
- excellent verbal communication skills, especially strong phone etiquette;
- strong research skills;
- ability to work with others;
- in-depth knowledge of Alaska.

Successful candidates will receive a stipend during their internship. Please fill out our online application or call 202.224.3004 to learn more about this exciting opportunity to work in Senator Sullivan’s Washington, D.C. office.
