End-of-semester checklist to promote student success
The end of the semester brings about a long list of to-do’s for students. During this time, students may struggle to remember everything they need to accomplish before the break. This Teaching Tip has five actions instructors can remind students to take each time a semester comes to a close.

Resources that Every Student Affairs Professional Should See
Although this year’s NASPA Conference was held virtually, it was definitely lively. If you haven’t already, click here for the slide decks from Skyfactor’s 2021 NASPA Virtual Conference presentations.

Teaching Tip: Creating a learner-centered syllabus
Research shows that a learner-centered syllabus increases positive student perception of the course and instructor, and generally leads to better learning outcomes. Here are specific ways you can update your syllabus to be more learner-centered.

3 models for differentiated mental health crisis response on campus
This is how six institutions adopted a differentiated response model in which trained mental health professionals respond to mental health crises alongside or instead of police.

Teaching Tip: Understanding content organization in Canvas
Content organization functions differently in Canvas than it does in Blackboard. Students will easily learn to navigate your course when you thoughtfully design how your content is presented.

(Mis)Understanding Students: Approaches to Affirming Student Identities
(Mis)Understanding Students, a new resource from the Advising Success Network and NASPA, offers a national, field-level context for this moment in time, to guide institutional leaders looking to reflect on their unique student populations.

Restore students’ sense of self-efficacy when they stumble
We identified three steps student success leaders can follow to get students get back on track to graduate—and turn pits into peaks.

Why a Coordinated Care Network improves the student experience
When different offices across campus are mutually committed to meeting students’ needs with minimal hassle, students are more likely to succeed.

Institutional Accountability for Student Success
Student success and mental health are top of mind for Presidents in higher ed, with 85% concerned about, “accelerated rates of attrition.” The pandemic is underscoring the importance of shifting priorities towards student-centered initiatives for building community and driving retention. Join this discussion and dive into the insights from the Annual Survey of College of Presidents with a packed panel of speakers.

Does advising really increase retention?
Here’s why you can feel confident that new advising investments will pay off, especially for students who need the most support.

Teaching Tip: Introducing the online course evaluation rubric
The Online Course Evaluation Rubric serves as a framework for making notes on and progress toward preparing your course for next semester. Several instructional designers worked together gathering important course elements into categories with evaluative statements to jumpstart your review.
